

Mill and the grading of punishments

According to "Mill's Doctrine" only actions that are harmful to others should be classified as punishable by law. Several theorists have criticized this position by claiming that the doctrine provides an unacceptable narrow basis on which to establish a grading of punishments. The purpose of this paper is critically to discuss this criticism as well as more recent attempts to avoid the grading objection.

Jesper Ryberg